This month, the Utah Assistive Technology Program's Logan coordinator departs for North Dakota. The program will continue, but his departure leaves a hole in a lot of hearts—not just among UATP staff but the many people he has served along the way.

Whether he was working with a client or giving a presentation to a US representative, one thing was clear: Clay was invested in his job, not just as a means to a paycheck but as a way to make people's lives better.

"Watching someone achieve their personal goals because of a little help we gave them is an emotional experience," he said following one of his early projects.
